We focus on ethical principles in many different ways in this innovative, interactive and engaging training. To begin the day our esteemed presenter Jenny Buckley, Hospice nurse and blogger will look at ethical frameworks and having difficult conversations with our clients/patients. In this unique training which was developed by social worker Anne McSweeney, LCSW – we will explore different ethical aspects of care. Long-term care and end-of-life conversations can be very difficult to initiate – both for professionals with their clients/patients and for family members. There is often dread and fear about bringing up long-term care or end-of-life wishes. We will also explore the ethics and necessity of having these conversations – looking at ethical principles around informed consent, autonomy vs. safety and dignity vs. risk. From here, we will take a closer look at cultural competency and ethics – using the powerful resource of the documentary film series “Worlds Apart. We will review case scenarios from “World’s Apart” – looking at culture and more ethical principles to consider. We will close by exploring the ethics of self-care. As helping professionals, we inform our clients/patients of the importance of self-care, while many of us are over-worked and under-performing due to compassion fatigue or burnout. Jenny, our presenter for this session, will guide attendees through self-care practices, ethical codes pertaining to self-care and the importance of self-care as a pre-requisite for adequate patient/client care. Jenny’s approach is simple yet effective, as she breaks down practical methods to incorporate self-care into your work. Attendees will leave with a take-away that will keep you encouraged all throughout the year!
