Helping professionals are often tasked with intimate responsibilities and duties in their clients' lives - whether it is assisting with bathing or helping monitor a person's vitals while they take their last breath - helping professionals have a lot to consider in delivering quality care. When caring for clients, nurses, case managers, social workers, and allied providers learn patients' favorite foods, treasured hobbies, or times they prefer to be alone. We fine-tune our listening skills to our client's every cue - recognizing when something is wrong or things are looking up. It is essential to know and understand a person's culture and background to really appreciate their specific needs and wishes. When it comes to understanding patients, we must individualize our treatment to each of our patients/clients; however, being culturally competent and knowing background information around diverse cultures is critical. Join presenters from Bridgeway Home Health for this illuminating presentation that is designed to help healthcare providers and helping professionals deliver culturally competent healthcare to their Sub-Saharan African clients.

Agenda:
