As effective helping professionals, we must know ethical techniques that surround communication as well as the ethical mandates around caring for ourselves as professionals. In this dynamic training – we will explore the traits and ethics that correspond with values of strong communication and leadership. We'll begin with Jamie Lackey, LCSW, presenting on appropriate professional boundaries, setting goals for self-care, and incorporating the practice of self-care into our everyday lives. Participants will feel invigorated with a better understanding of how to balance their work and professional spheres while maintaining (and increasing) overall wellness. As we continue our day of learning we will take this a step further, knowing that as helping professionals we walk alongside individuals and families as they navigate complex life experiences, hospital and community systems, and safety net programs. Often, those interactions happen during vulnerable and stressful times for our clients. Understanding the different types of behavioral communication styles provides a context for which to view and address the types of behaviors we may encounter in our practice. In this fascinating presentation, Kim Wilson LPC will facilitate a thorough overview of the four types of behavioral communication types.. As we strive for excellence in our professions, this training will allow you to explore best practices in ethical communication as well as tips for caring for yourself as mandated through our professional code of ethics.
