In an ideal situation, clients with mental illness who are experiencing a crisis situation will consent to evaluation and participate in the treatment process. Unfortunately, there are many circumstances that influence clients to reject evaluation and treatment, including fear, prior negative experiences, the state of the mental health system, and mental health symptoms themselves (paranoia, delusions, hallucinations, etc.). The 1013 Form in Georgia provides an avenue in which these clients can be involuntarily detained until receiving a thorough mental health evaluation in the event that an authorized clinician assesses a substantial risk of imminent harm to self or others, or an inability of the client to care for his/her own physical health and safety. However, while arguably necessary for the safety and wellbeing of the client and others, the 1013 process is not without ethical quandaries. In this informative and thought-provoking presentation, Renette Arnold, MSW, LCSW, MAC, will present an overview of the 1013 process in Georgia (including when and how to complete the form, state specific regulations and cultural competency issues), and then examine important ethical considerations. Complex topics such as beneficence v. maleficence, justice v. proportionality, dignity, informed consent and autonomy will be addressed.
