As end of life approaches, it can be an extremely frightening and overwhelming time for patients and families – with incredible physical, emotional and spiritual needs. While hospices and hospitals address many of the physical needs – it is the emotional and spiritual needs that are often the most critical and be a challenge to address. There has been a recent, new movement, though, that has us “rethinking how we die” (Huffington Post). Similar to birth doulas who assist expectant mothers and their families – there are now death doulas who assist patients and families at the end of their lives. Death doulas are companions of sorts – assisting patients and families with ensuring their needs and desires are followed through in their last days. In this CE training, we will explore more about this new movements of death doulas – including a brief documentary which shows their role. Social workers, nurses, case managers and other allied health professionals will learn more about this new resource and how death doulas might be able to assist patients/families in their time of need.
