Ethics, End-of-Life and Much More

As healthcare professionals, clinicians and funeral directors, we walk beside our clients/patients/families through many difficult situations – including illness and end-of-life. Helping our clients to navigate these crossroads can be very challenging and emotional for all involved. The more resources that we have, the better equipped we are to assist our clients in negotiating these challenges. In addition, there are ethical principles that come into play around advance care planning, end-of-life and difficult conversations. This interactive, engaging training serves to “add to our toolbox of resources” while at the same time, exploring these ethics that also come into play. We begin our day of learning with Christine Banks, who will share her personal story of loss and grief – taking a closer look at Kubler-Ross’ Stages of Grief, Advance Care Planning and Ethics. From there, Jenny Buckley, Hospice Nurse, and HOPEspot blogger will review the many different types of grief, difficult conversations and ethical perspectives around all of this. We will play the “Hello Game” together and learn it’s value as a resource to pass along to our clients/families as a potential way to reframe these difficult conversations. Finally, ending our day, we will take a closer look at Legacy Writing and Ethical Wills. Anne McSweeney, LMSW will review some ethical frameworks as well as Legacy Writing and Dignity Therapy benefits and Joseph Bertino, PhD will review the practice of writing an Ethical Will – which can leave behind our own legacy of values and love.

3. Name 3 different types of Grief and ways to assist our clients/patients in coping with them.
